Luzia Maia states her strategies for staying in business has been to offer products that are in demand, keep existing product line consistent, be hands-on as an owner and raise prices to accommodate rising costs. Mocha Java's ambiance of being family friendly attracts many. Customers use Mocha Java as a gathering place of all sorts. The best seating may be in the lovely courtyard where pets are welcomed

PROJECT OVERVIEW

Mocha Java is located in the Kakaako district which is now becoming a vibrant pedestrian-oriented urban community. Mocha Java's website is outdated and does not reflect the quickly growing redevelopment of this area. The project objective is to redesign the website to match its surroundings and to stay current and competitive with other coffee houses and breakfast restaurants. The new website will portray a clear identity, showcase the cafe's eclectic offerings, provide social media links, have easy menu navigation and downloadable PDF menus, just to name a few.

TARGET AUDIENCE

The primary target audience include those that live, work, and shop in the Kakaako and Honolulu area. Target age is diverse but range mainly between 20's-50's. They are educated, health conscious and have an appreciation for good coffee and healthy eats.

COMPETITION WEBSITE

the good > Island Brew Coffeehouse's website contains a mission statement and a clear identity to those wanting to know more about them. Easy to navigate website and easy to find locations through Google map.

the bad > The menu web page doesn't show their menu offerings. Instead, users must click on a downloadable PDF file. Their Online store web page is less than impressive and slightly confusing. It is inconsistent to their other web pages and have many blank squares where pictures of their products should be.

the good > Impressive homepage with simple top navigation bar. Has social media links and their contact web page has Google map locator.

the bad > Kissaten Coffee Bar's website fails in portraying a clear identity. There is no mission statement or introduction paragraphs talking about their establishment. Their menu webpage is incomplete in design and content and does not list their coffee, tea, smoothies, or juices.

Sherry works in the same center as Mocha Java and occasionally goes down to the cafe to get a smoothie whenever she works a double shift. As a full time student who averages 30 hour work weeks and lives far from town, Sherry tries to consolidate most of her studying near work.

Her business class group wanted to set meetings outside of campus to work on their final term project and were considering locations. Sherry thought of Mocha Java and went on their website so she could send her classmates more information about the place. Sherry did not feel it was impressive enough to wow her classmates into selecting the place. Therefore, Sherry forwarded them current social media links and Yelp reviews. She also made it a point to grab take out menus after one of her work shifts.

Brad saw Mocha Java from the street as he drove by and noticed the outdoor seating. When he got home he logged onto their website to find out more but found it to be very outdated. The menu seemed interesting, but for more, updated information and reviews on the place Brad logged onto Yelp and social media. Liking all the reviews and current information he read, he then called the cafe to find out about highchairs and if dogs were allowed on their outside terrace. Which to both questions, the answer was "YES!"

Mary is health conscious and does research on healthy eateries in the Ward Village through Yelp and Trip Advisor. Visitors recommend Mocha Java. Mary decides to log onto their website. It showed enough of the menu offerings by breaking it down into breakfast, lunch, and snacks but made vegetarian and vegan choices harder to identify. The outdated website also didn't do much to keep Mary interested in staying there. Mary decides to return back to Yelp and Trip Advisor to continue her research of Mocha Java Cafe.
